ADHD - How can we help children and young people? (EPSS twilight)

Outline

This training will consider ADHD as a theoretical construct associated with neurodevelopmental differences. It will explore what research tells us about the impact that these differences can have on thinking and learning skills, mood, behaviour and outcomes across the lifespan. It will then discuss strategies that can be put in place to support children and young people; especially within an educational setting.

Description

At the end of the session, it is hoped that those attending will have developed a better understanding of ADHD as a construct and will feel confident to support children and young people who experience negative outcomes as a result of their differences.

Audience

This session is for all staff working with children and young people in an educational setting.
