A training day of practical ideas
Summer 2007

Evidence

From "Make School Make Sense" 2006, a report by the NAS

- 45% of parents say it took over a year for their child to receive any support.
- There are more appeals to the Special Educational Needs (SEN) and Disability Tribunal in England about autism than any other type of SEN. 79% of parents who appealed to the Tribunal in this survey won their case.
- 1 in 5 children with autism has been excluded from school, and 67% of these have been excluded more than once.
- In mainstream schools only 27% of parents say that all their child's teachers could adjust their approach and teaching materials – and therefore meet their legal duties under the SEN and Disability Act (2001).
- Over 40% of children with autism have been bullied at school.

Mainstreaming Autism

Mainstreaming Autism aims to inform on current developments and research, explore issues and provide tried and tested solutions for teaching children with autistic spectrum disorders (ASDs) in mainstream schools and settings.

A particular focus of the day will be the management and teaching of pupils with Asperger syndrome or high-functioning autism and how language and communication problems may give rise to challenging behaviours. Overall, by presenting a positive and holistic view of ASD, we aim to give participants greater confidence in their work in school.

Evidence

“Living and working with people with autistic disorders is not like living or working with anyone else with or without disabilities. Past experiences of social interaction and a desire to help are not sufficient guides. It is essential to understand the nature of autistic conditions. People with these disorders, because of their social impairments cannot meet you half way. You have to make an imaginative leap into their world and try to see things from their point of view.”
